he does not suppose they have never been offered a cent. They have never extertained an actual offer of any kind. Thy do not wish to sell, and Mr. Twomey says that so far as he knows he to man with the intention of buying the mine has ever gone into it. It is unlikely, he thinks, that an offer has been made for anything that could not be seen. It is the policy of the management to admit no one. There is nothing to be concealed and nothing to be advertised, but crowds of visitors are annoying and exhaustive of valuable time. Mr. Twomey says that a proposition to purchase the mine would not likely be considered. The receipts from it are so extensive and steady that the property is the most valuable in the estimation of an essient business man who would not likely be attracted from that sort of an invertenint by an alluring hump sum.
